

Academic Year 2019 Graduate School of Social Sciences, Hitotsubashi University
Requirements for Application to the Doctoral Program
Institute for the Study of Global Issues

This document provides information for external candidates. Internal candidates i.e. those currently on Masters programs at Hitotsubashi University and those who already hold a Masters degree from Hitotsubashi University, should see the 進学要綱 (in Japanese only).

The Institute for the Study of Global Issues is open to those motivated to become researchers or high-level professionals tackling various matters of global importance. Three basic principles distinguish this course.

1. Issue Focused: Rather than starting out from traditional academic areas, students launch studies from the field looking at current real issues, and seek to unravel the complex contexts of global issues.
2. Solution Oriented: Not stopping at problem analysis, the studies attempt to present viewpoints, thinking, and concepts from new dimensions, and are oriented to problem-solving.
3. De-Eurocentric: Another important aim is to go beyond traditional Western-centered thinking and develop new concepts of global society as the interaction of multiple centers.

Adopting these as basic principles, research and education are centered on the following four points: 1) Security, 2) Sustainability, 3) Creativity, and 4) Identity, striving to raise the quality of global society and individual lives.

The curriculum of this course is designed around two sets of subjects, theoretical and practical. The theoretical subjects pursue issues from a theoretical approach based on the five key areas of culture, transnationality, peace, media, and the environment. The practical subjects cover practical approaches to issues and media techniques, among other topics. In addition to seminars consisting of small numbers of students and their academic supervisor, visiting faculty at the forefront of their fields are invited from outside Japan, and cooperation is received from Mitsubishi Research Institute, the Japan Institute of International Affairs, the Japan Foundation, and the Japan International Cooperation Agency.

See the Institute for the Study of Global Issues website <http://isgi.soc.hit-u.ac.jp/> for more details.

6. Selection process and criteria

In the first-stage examination, based on the submitted thesis and application documents, the applicant’s research level, academic importance of the research project, match to the fields of this Graduate School, and feasibility of the research plan are assessed. Another factor considered is whether the school has a faculty member able to provide guidance in the area of the research project. Those who pass the first stage go on to the second-stage examination.

The second stage is an interview. The interview assesses the applicant’s understanding of, ability to explain, and capacity to carry out the research described in the application. The interview is also used to assess whether the applicant has the foreign or Japanese language ability necessary for the research. Depending on the nature of the research project, the language ability assessment may be done orally or using written materials. Final acceptance is decided as the sum result of the first-stage and second-stage exams.
