6. Selection process and criteria

In the first-stage examination, based on the submitted thesis and application documents, the applicant's research level, academic importance of the research project, match to the fields of this Graduate School, and feasibility of the research plan are assessed. Another factor considered is whether the school has a faculty member able to provide guidance in the area of the research project. Those who pass the first stage go on to the second-stage examination.

The second stage is an interview. The interview assesses the applicant's understanding of, ability to explain, and capacity to carry out the research described in the application. The interview is also used to assess whether the applicant has the foreign or Japanese language ability necessary for the research. Depending on the nature of the research project, the language ability assessment may be done orally or using written materials. If, however, conducting a language competency test is considered inappropriate to the nature of the research project, a comprehension test may be conducted instead, based on Japanese historical materials. Final acceptance is decided as the sum result of the first-stage and second-stage exams.
